Here is a thought from last week's homily: Parents, you have become poor so that your children can have what they need.

My aunt Ann was 93 when she died. Here are some stories from the funeral.

The first person that caught my eye as I entered the Cathedral of the Holy Spirit in Bismarck was a young man with green hair in a haphazard man-bun. His ears were pierced, and they sported BIG black earrings. I looked at him and I thought, "Family!" I did have a chance to meet him personally. I am guessing that he is a second cousin.

I learned that Ann had not been driving for two years. One of her granddaughters came to her apartment every Wednesday, after work, and took her grocery shopping and did whatever errands or tasks that needed to be done. This generosity and devotion and commitment is inspiring! I am simply in awe thinking about it.

My aunt was buried next to her husband of 60 years, Valentine. They are resting in the only North Dakota Veterans' Cemetery, outside of Mandan, ND. It was beautiful! All the grave markers are the same. The prayers for the committal are offered in a small chapel, and then the family can accompany the body to the place of interment if they choose to do so.

At the funeral lunch I sat with the men-cousins. They were talking about water heaters and how nice it is to have someone else install them when they stop heating. I met a first cousin I did not know existed. His mother was my dad's sister, Catherine. Catherine died at the age of 30 from cancer. My cousin Tony lives in Indiana.

On the way home, my 88-year-old mother mentioned that her driver's license expires this September. She plans to renew it, "for the last time." She has that day in September all mapped out. She has to go to Fargo to renew her license, which is 40 miles from Hillsboro, and she does not drive in Fargo or much out of town at all. She will arrange to take the senior bus on a day my sister Ann is free for lunch. She will ace the eye exam and walk out of the office with a new license. You go, girl!

We are still looking for people to fill out the schedule for Tuesday Adoration and for substitutes. The sign-up sheets are in the Hall of Saints. Please consider joining this important prayer ministry.
